Department of Nutrition & Dietetics

In present scenario, society needs awareness regarding their diet. The common man is gradually switching towards nutritionist and dietitians for scientifically proved information on balanced diet or modified diet. This interest in the society to gain knowledge on diet planning can lead to have a healthy life and especially in preventing the development of degenerative diseases. Nutrition/Dietetics program is the application of nutritional science in order to promote health and to treat medical conditions. The Program is for students with a strong interest in food, people, science and medicine who wish to use their knowledge to help prevent and treat disease as a registered dietitian.

Dietetic students learn how food intake and dietary requirements can be altered by illness, and how to apply therapeutic diets to treat disease. Dietetics involves translating nutritional science and information about food into practical dietary advice.

This may be aimed at the general public to promote health, or in a clinical environment to treat a wide range of medical disorders. Masters will develop the attributes, qualities, and skills considered essential for gaining employment and making an important contribution in the community they will serve.

Food and nutrition companies, apart from nutritional composition of products, are more focusing on food supplements or formulations with functional properties and therapeutic or nutraceutical value etc. In market many types of functional foods are available for all age groups and try to fulfil the requirements of people with different physiological status, during the course students will acquire the knowledge, skills and expertise required to excel in this fascinating field.

Department of Water & Health

The continuous rise in population and environmental problems are witnessing a drastic destruction of our living habitat which is not only resulting in climate change and drinking water problems due to pollution but also in outbreaks of several communicable and non-communicable diseases. Water contamination and climate change poses many threats to human health from severe weather and water linked infectious disease risks to disrupted food systems and population displacement.

To manage these water associated health threats and other environmental problems, we must switchover to sustainable management approaches including technological frameworks to mitigate the water contamination, drinking water treatment options, climate change in many areas, alternative energy sources, including green infrastructure, governance and technology.

Human exposure to water associated infections occurs by unsafe drinking water, contact with contaminated water, recreational water, or food. The Department of Water & Health (DW&H), as the name indicates is dedicated to carryout extensive research on analysis, assessment and mitigation of human diseases through water treatment and sustainable environmental management approaches including geo-spatial techniques and nanotechnology. The DW&H has recognized as one of the pioneer research centre in the field of Water Research and Technology. The major research activities mainly concentrating on advanced water treatment (PC/PEC, Hybrid-membrane technology, bio-remediation, etc) methods for safe and clean drinking water, integrated water resources management at catchment and rural level, water quality improvement and feasible treatment techniques at rural region, water-energy-environment nexus, advanced materials for clean and alternative energy, geo-spatial techniques for water resource management and sustainable township, nano-technological approaches for human health and environment, pollution mitigation techniques and ecosystem conservation.

All faculty members are well qualified and have good interdisciplinary research experience from pioneer research institutes that enable to mentoring the students to achieve their research goal of their interest. Moreover, the faculty members have a unique diversity of research interests and actively encourage cross-disciplinary research problems. The research activities in the DW&H is associated and supported by world class hospital with more than 300 health professionals from medical, dental and pharmacy fields to enhance the skills which provides better understanding of dynamic interaction of water-health-energy-environment nexus mechanisms and mitigation strategies.

The faculty members in DW&H has research collaborations with reputed institutions at national and international level and providing excellent platforms under research exchange program to the students and research scholars to carryout cutting edge research in the field of Water Research and Advanced Technology. The DW&H has received financial support from national and international funding agencies to conduct the state-of-art research in the field of Water and Health Research.
